

Murals of North Nashville Now

Conte Community Arts Gallery
August 10, 2019–January 5, 2020
Organized by the Frist Art Museum

What:

A vibrant street art scene has emerged throughout Nashville alongside its rapid expansion in recent years. Murals can be seen now on walls in The Nations, the Gulch, Nolensville Road, and many other places. Those found in North Nashville, a historically African American neighborhood, stand out because they are typically made by artists with strong ties to the area and because the imagery reflects its unique character and important social issues. They also demonstrate the multifaceted nature of the community, addressing both persistent problems such as displacement, gun violence, and incarceration, as well as positive elements like thriving black-owned businesses, a revitalized art scene, and valuable educational institutions.

This exhibition seeks to shine a light on this culturally and historically rich yet often underserved part of the city. A young generation of artists—many following in the tradition of Tennessee State University professors Sam Dunson and Michael McBride, and mentors Michael “Ol Skool” Mucker, James Threackill, and Thaxton Waters—offer their perspectives on the present position of North Nashville through newly commissioned site-specific murals. The project also explores the role of the arts in urban redevelopment and in the expression of community identities, further testifying that art can be found all around us, not just inside museums and galleries.
